Will you be as "lucky"?

"I call on insurance. An Elmer and I had a car accident. I was hurt, missing a date for 3 long months. My own savings would have gone if I hadn't had a Great West Life income policy which replaced my savings."

—age 35, C. E. F.

"I'm a business woman. A fall on the stairs caused a serious back injury—I'm still laid up. My money went straight to hospital bills. I had a Great West accident insurance which paid all my bills and I got a cheque every month to live on."

—Miss F. G. H.

If a simple twist of the wrist sometimes spells magic, a simple twist of the knee may spell disaster. So may a lingering illness. Why risk losing many months' income—literally meaning years of savings—when you can protect your income for such a small amount. How? With a Great West Life "Preferred Protector" policy.

While you are laid up, you and your family will receive a guaranteed monthly income. It can also take care of your hospital and doctor's bills if you wish.

The surprisingly reasonable premium is a small price to pay for this protection of your income. Learn more about this plan. For full information fill out the coupon. It may be the wisest thing you'll ever do.

They're going to have a baby...

Here is a couple who have recently learned that they are going to have a baby. They are sitting at a table in a restaurant, and the waiter is bringing them a glass of milk.

Throughout the country there are about half a million couples like this one who are waiting for the birth of their first child.

Thanks to the progress with which modern science has advanced pregnancy and childbirth, the future is better than ever. The expectancy of life is now more than 70 years, and the birth rate is still high. In 1950, for example, there were 1.5 million live births in the United States.

The world population is now about 2.5 billion. In 1950, there were 1.5 billion. The world population is now about 2.5 billion. In 1950, there were 1.5 billion. The world population is now about 2.5 billion. In 1950, there were 1.5 billion.

LONDON LETTER

By Beverly Baxter

When Louis Spoke and Winnie Listened

HOW BIG is the City of London? Sorry, you are wrong. What is the population of the City of London? Twelve million? Any number you choose will be wrong. Just don't, Aunt. You could not be more wrong.

From this somewhat flustered opening in my London Letter last week you can see how much of a challenge I had to give of your own special knowledge on this subject. The City of London is a tiny place in a vast area bounded west by the River Thames and north by the City Wall.

I am sorry to have to inform you that when night falls the City becomes almost completely deserted. It is a tragedy to the Guildhall or the Museum House. Whereas in 1800 there was a night population of nearly forty thousand it has now declined to little more than two thousand.

Before I go on, this small community used to send an MP to Westminster. Then as the struggle of progress moved in its millions we saw conditions like we were talking in fact, the time to go, and now it has no exclusive representation at all. In fact the City of London has been divided, for parliamentary purposes, into the constituency of Westminster.

But my Tory friend for Harold Wilson, because he was not content with the City, did not go to the Government but to the House of Commons. He was a member of the House of Commons in the Government of the Conservative Party. He was a member of the House of Commons in the Government of the Conservative Party. He was a member of the House of Commons in the Government of the Conservative Party.

All that is a possibility in the fact that a few weeks ago I received an official invitation to attend the Guildhall of always a clerk of the morning when Mr. Louis St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, was to have the freedom of the City of London bestowed on him. This meant that we would have to come as if we were going to attend his funeral.

The Guildhall was fully thronged when Mr. St. Laurent arrived. It was a great day for the City. The Guildhall was fully thronged when Mr. St. Laurent arrived. It was a great day for the City. The Guildhall was fully thronged when Mr. St. Laurent arrived. It was a great day for the City.

Fortunately the day from the most beautiful weather stopped just at the end of the day. It was a member of a few weeks ago I received an official invitation to attend the Guildhall of always a clerk of the morning when Mr. Louis St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, was to have the freedom of the City of London bestowed on him. This meant that we would have to come as if we were going to attend his funeral.

So we gathered to the Guildhall on this

When he received the Freedom of the City of London St. Laurent presented the Guildhall with the tradition of the House of Commons.

Do we actually know where to face Communism?

Many church members in the Communist era.

Communism and Christianity

Where are the churches of today? The worshippers of East Germany and Poland. Today, the Christian congregation and membership of Christ's Church - gone beneath the pavement of materialistic atheism that today makes us all of every twenty people living.

To communism, Christian countries present a last target. Their consciousness religious indifference, empty pews and empty churches mark as they pray to a fanatic, unbelief, unbelief.

It is time for deep searching of our hearts. We can meet communism physically with guns or swords or police men - but spiritually? We need to re-affirm the faith that has made our nation great... to once more our spiritual frontiers.

Can Canada Bridge the Gap?

BOTTLE in time and abroad (which is being used to play a more subtle role in trying to break the deadlock) or at least bridge the gap in communication between the United States and Communist China.

Details in close enough to Washington to have several hours about Communist China policy which the Red Chinese should know too. Ottawa maintained no official policy that the U.S. exports and intends the Communist Chinese to take over the coastal islands such as Quemoy and Matsu. The U.S. has promised to help defend these islands against Communist attack, because the U.S. has no intention of yielding in time, but neither is there any intention to bring in its limits except of territory substantially. Just when or how they are to be handled with standard China is a question of timing and tactics, in the end, through and before any great hope at last, the Department of State will have to withdraw.

The United States has told China that it is not likely to let her only return to the aid of the U.S. and that the U.S. must give up all idea of its involvement with standard China is a question of timing and tactics, in the end, through and before any great hope at last, the Department of State will have to withdraw.

any further aspect of the moment, in the face of Communist threats, would be concerned as an extension of weakness and would have a dangerous effect on Western prestige in Asia. They think it would rather decide not only in Taiwan could help, they report as very important, but also in Southeast Asia where the political battle with Communism is joined. They think more from the South Viet Nam, Laos, Cambodia, perhaps even Korea would be led to conclude that the Communist side in the wrong side and the gap for a short little country in Asia.

Therefore they can't simply draw outside to Red China, by not meeting, neither these words, that they intend to let the period, always and family "back" China's position as President. In the position as here in the Communist China is now when it is, however really any?

UP TO YOU the Western world has had two main channels of communication with Peking, set through the two and the other Chinese. John's relations with the Red Chinese government are purely and fundamentally two relations with the United States are pure and unadorned as far as the U.S. is able to be marginal of American political and American too more than any most of today's first relations in the Communist side. For both new ones, both as pure as possible in the present case.

Finally has the opposite difficulty the relations with the U.S. is a type of experienced experience and the transport of the United States policy once we United is created day. The continuously. Continued on page 48

Harry Lane, of an old family that had lost its money, had been a flier in the Battle of Britain. When he had come home and had taken the dull job at thirteen thousand a year, his picture had often appeared in the papers as the organizer of golf tournaments for Seamen's Cups and in the speaker at sport lunquets and series such luncheons. He knew everybody

[illegible]

The corridor here is small, of wet fir and cedar and there was a hint of cooing. The weather had been bad all week. A mild flu epidemic, no influenza that started with a head cold and coughing was prevalent. Crossing along the corridor was the newspaperman they called The Young Lion, because he was determined to outwrite, outdo and outsmart all his older colleagues and he had realized as he recognized some older men he reported. A few people behind him was Lorraine Hansberry, the seldom-remembered, and when he caught up to it, I said, "I want to know whether any of the boys would like to visit me in my home in their life." "The school has not been open for a long time," he said. "I am not sure if it is still open." It seemed to belong to me. He made his way toward his friend, Alan, the rich-fair promoter who was talking to Lingling, the opening director of the film, and The Delivery is a friend of mine. Lane is from another day.

wonder that Scotty Bowman and Mary Lane should not share friendship in a moment. "Come here, Mike," Haggerty called to the actor, Mike Ron, who had a ship in St. Catherine's Bay. "He was an old middle-weight fighter and boxing had arranged for the boat that had started him in business. Bumping off by himself afterward. Mike the Scholar had his hands barred on the pockets of his special black lightweight winter coat. He was thirty-five and he had a broken nose. "That's a brother, Mike," Eddie Adams called him. "Why do you go and look for trouble every time?" "I'm just a man," Mike said. "For me there is no job. Scotty was my friend."

"You say yes. Are they bringing the pot?"
"I mean it. Not yet."
"We'll all be dead. These things only happen among friends. What's the point of having friends if you can't get down into trouble?"
"But Scotty loves his job anyway," Mike said earnestly. "He loves his profession and he has a wife and children. I know what that means."
"The case here's been tried yet," Top O'Connell said. "Haggerty may be able to put Scotty in a very good light. It's a gift with Harry."
"I hope so," Mike said. "This thing is all wrong you know. Something is very wrong. There is no life left Scotty got out of and Mary Lane is well, everybody likes Harry. I keep asking myself why this should be?"

The policemen suddenly opened the door and they all began to file into the big high-ceilinged painted courtroom. Two spectators had been let in ahead of the others. Mrs. Bowman sat in a gray-haired man, a fairly broad, but he was allowed to enter with the lawyers from the side door. She was a young woman, white-haired woman in a brown hat and a brown cloth coat with a little fur on the collar. As the benches began to fill around her, her back and back grew rapid. The Chamber sat in one row and the dockkeepers who knew each other kept together in another row. They all seemed to know where they belonged. No one got out of place, and bright sunlight came through the high windows.

At the crowded press table Edwina, the dignified bald little court reporter for the Sun, looked first at a suitable seat. "How can I work with someone sitting at my feet," he protested loudly. Then Mollie Morris, Judge Morris' daughter, who did a column for the Sun once in and every body wanted. She was Mary Lane's girl. The one had believed she would come and sit at the press table, but she came hurrying in with her far row open her open heavy golden ring in a floppy, nothing sound, her high-chinned face with the bright, intense eyes, flashed from hurrying

The scene unfolded as Scotty Bowman was led to the dock. In the last two months Scotty had got older. He looked like the forty-year-old man, with a glum wife and two children. He had lost weight. His hair had been gray since, he had been fifty-eight, but he had been plump and jolly, not sleeping a night in his old new apartment the dock. In one quick furious glance he took in all the spectators till he found his wife. In the back as in the last gate of the fight, or sitting in Dorfman's, feeling as pleased as he there with more interest of participation than his experience and glumness later, he had always met a man's eyes. All his energy had seemed to shine on his usual blue eyes. He finished at his collar, then turned to the window and looked at the dock of sunlight that just reached the dock, then he turned his head and his face became as pale as paper. Roger Quarm, stood up and went over to speak to him. Scotty lifted his head as if he knew a coaching rule had given him some dignity and that he could too.

When Judge Thompson came in everybody stood up, although some of them made a few men as first. But he was only that first. His white shirt front rose over the heads of the lawyers and the clerk in his courtroom the steps to the chair. He had a big head and heavy-lidded eyes and his white shirt he looked a little like Scotty Chase without a beard as he glanced steadily at the open window. He was about to see something a wall and he had taken a moment of time to go and looking over before leaving the house. His knowing was not good and the courtroom emotions were bad and, as always, he looked up carefully at the high ceiling. While the jury was being selected he looked with interest, not then, went on many papers, looking and over to the left, then looked his hands and moved.

The jury was selected quickly because there were no challenges from Roger Quarm. They were policemen, fishermen, waiters and an old man. One by one, they walked to their chairs, and when they were all together, they were in two rows hunched against the media window, they did look like men of common sense. Then Scotty stood up and the charge was read. "This, guilty," he said finally.

They didn't need a special prosecutor to handle Scotty's case. It was too simple. The case as usual was being handled by George Henderson. His red eyes, his gray mustache washed up a little and the network of red veins at his cheeks told everybody why he had started having a distinguished career. John Goodwin, he called, looking both heads behind

The pity in Mollie's eyes hurt her pride. "No," he said firmly. Then he dropped his

"I told Harry. But you can go against people like he did. You can't get away with it."

"I won't have this happen to Harry in my place. I don't think what he would say about him."

"You really, very much, you know him. I've heard of you. You're the lady one."

"I'll see that you go to Harry — as other white people. I'll see that you go."

"Can't you see I'm trapped? I can't get up off the floor."

"I apologize, Harry. For you I've been a big troublemaker. I want to make things right."

"Am I not supposed to have any shame? Harry? Why did you let them do it? What's there now?"

"You thief, you dirty thief!" Harry had cried by the candles.

him could be given and obliging around to look for the bank again.

The thin grey man in a grey suit, grumpy doing a job he hated, clutched the rail right and never let go. He looked at his condensed milk, brought out that he had been with the bank for thirty years and a super-saturated for five. Thus he told him he had discovered that Bowman had misrepresented the security he had got from Lane. He had represented to the bank that he had taken thirty thousand shares of Western Oil as security for fifteen thousand dollars he had loaned Harry Lane. The market value of these thirty thousand shares at the time he made the loan would have been equal to twice the amount of the loan. The fact was he had taken only fifteen thousand shares as security. Of course, by the time the deception was discovered the shares were worth about a thousand dollars.

"Did you ask Mr. Bowman why he misrepresented the amount of security he had got from Lane?"

"I did."

"What did he say?"

"He said he had wanted to leave the bank alone."

"And why the misrepresentation of what he had done?"

"I asked him, of course, and he said that after he had consulted himself to making the loan he felt he owed it to Harry Lane to go through with it, he believed in it. Thus wanted to be no risk at all. The last offer couldn't have the confidence in Harry Lane that he had and he said it was of a matter of confidence."

"He said he had misrepresented the confidence of the loan?"

"Well, there it was, and he admitted it."

"Will the witness please step up?" the judge said loudly. "Speak out. You have nothing to be ashamed of. It's hard to lose anything in this court. Now what was it you said? Then this a fact."

Clawing his throat, the super-saturated said, "I was the 'my the stock ordered' before noon, and I cannot. He had been busy and told I heard about it, or I suppose he could have called out and bought shares to cover himself for not so writing, but there I was confronting him 'well, he said he was afraid he would be prosecuted,' and Bowman's word failed as he looked at Betty."

"I know that is an unpleasant task for you," the judge said gently. "But it is an honorable one."

"You said that Mr. Bowman admitted that his misrepresentation of the security he had taken on the loan would leave him charged with fraud."

"Oh possibly conspiracy."

"There's no charge of conspiracy with anyone. Just the admitted fraud."

"Oh, but I object," Gurnet said, rising slowly. "My friend goes too fast. Mr. Bowman has pleaded not guilty. All that the witness has brought out is Mr. Bowman's recognition of his misstatement of certain facts that might lead to these charges."

"That might be very well put in the defense counsel's argument to the jury," the judge said smiling.

"Well, those are the facts," Henderson said simply. "He didn't want to make a big thing of it. It wasn't necessary. Looking his hands behind his back he has given his statement. Your witness."

"Mr. Gurnet," Gurnet said, with a somewhat little bow and a friendly smile as if he only wanted to be helpful, "how long have you known Mr. Bowman?"

"About fifteen years, sir."

"And what was your opinion of his character?"

"I had the highest opinion of him."

"And a witness on his reputation?"

"No, sir."

"Is that would you not say that in your own mind he had always been considered a man of the highest integrity?"

"That's true," and for the first time he was at ease with himself.

"Mr. Bowman," Gurnet said, looking slowly toward the jury, yet apparently unaware that he was making himself one with the twelve men of common sense, "supposing Mr. Bowman had made that loan to Harry Lane, just as he did—straight and all as it was—and it had been paid within a week with interest, as Mr. Bowman believed it would, would that have been the proceeds?"

"Well, we might never have discovered that there had been a loan represented and repaid."

"And he might not be here in the dock at all?"

"Well, I don't know. I can't tell about it and here."

"Oh, I know, because you are sure that of Bowman's confidence in Harry Lane had been justified."

"That wouldn't justify the misrepresentation."

"Now look here," Gurnet said, smiling, and he smiled at the jury, "if Lane had repaid the loan, as he promised to do, in a few days and picked up his security, where would we be?"

"That the thing was discovered."

"All right. Now how Mr. Bowman always shows good looking judgment?"

"The very best."

"Will he come to his friend Lane?"

"Well, you would see after."

"By the way, when you questioned him about misrepresenting the security he had got from Lane, did you ask what in the world happened to his judgment?"

The man with the coat

"I did."

"And what did he say?"

"He was agast. Stunned to find he had committed himself, and had acquiesced in Lane's."

"He seemed to feel under an obligation, a personal obligation?"

"As far as I could see," the superintendent said, with a helpless gesture, "it was just because he was Harry Lane."

"Just because he was Harry Lane?" O'Connell repeated softly, and as he murmured again and pondered, everybody waiting and watching, was sure he was repeating the words over and over to himself. "Thank you that's all," he said finally. When the superintendent had left the dusk Haddenham said, "Call Harry Lane." They called "Harry Lane." The gentleman at the door repeated "Harry Lane," and he walked along the corridor.

They all turned to see him come in, but the press had the best view of him, as he approached the box. He bowed up, his shoulders back like a man with some military training. He was thirty-two, about five foot eight and slender, and he had curly black hair and good teeth. "Pleasant to meet you," he said to the man who had been disappointed at him. He had on a heavy blue coat and a white shirt and a blue tie with a thin red stripe in it, and though Haddenham said, "a good suit, a dandy's look like Harry's," he made it very plain that as Harry could, and the old fellow, Mike Ken, the color whopper. He gradually got that out from under his coat. "What a pleasure it would be to make a walk for him." And Haddenham, smiling, nodded him. "Better make it clear whether or not players who wear those suits of yours, Mike. It'll be a whole lot of fun to see you up to the carriage track."

They all expected there to have an easy confident manner and look as if he belonged for he was always sure he belonged wherever he went. Coming from an old family as he did he had always belonged to the place where people with money went. He belonged to the Royal Golf Club, the M.A.A., he had been a Racer, and his father when he had been alive had belonged to the Mount Royal Club. He had been incredibly lucky in the way where he should have been shot down a dozen times, and he had had half when he came home and got his left leg with a broken hip. Everybody would say he didn't want to be anything else but what he was alive and back home again with his own people and being fairly well with the money and joy of being alive. When he drove his Jaguar he looked like the cops at the accidents. He was a certainly generous and generous looking man, who wanted to see everybody along his path with and had had a lot of luck in this way and seemed to appreciate it. But he was a man of great charm and slightly theatrical gestures. If he bought a pack of cigarettes he always bought one for the friend with him, he never passed by a postmaster. He overheard everywhere. He wore bright checked English jackets and bright scarves and looked like a polo player in them. Two months ago he had bought an expensive English light-colored silk hat in New York. Very light grey, he could tell a top in a ball in his hand without shaking it, and when Ted Ogilvie had advised it he had walked on giving it to him. Standing out there in the corridor Ted had been wearing the hat. All these gestures seemed to be led to Haddenham to something or other that nobody understood.

But he made a bad impression as much as he got out of the hat. He went to press, then tried to suppress it quickly as his friends waiting him, smiled. But the press was not one of his friends. He was really tired and troubled. He had been up nearly all night. He had gone home early enough, but before he could get undressed and into bed there had been a knock at the door. It was the young blond wife of the rich old partner, who was early, being in the apartment upstairs. For a month her husband's nerves had been going to pieces. Worrying about everything, he was really afraid of being left alone. Now he was upstairs, she did it, pushing that he had no friends and threatening to kill himself. "I know it's silly," she had pleaded, "because he has a worry in the world. He likes you, Harry, won't you come up?" You're good for him. He had signed and promised a letter, then he had gone upstairs to drink with the old partner and cheer him up with amusing stories which he could use for him. It had been casual really. All that was the matter with the old partner was that every time he looked at his young wife he felt old and nervous. "Things look different when you're around, Harry," he kept saying and wouldn't let him go off to bed in the morning.

Back in his own place he couldn't sleep. He kept going over and over the story he had to tell about Harry Haddenham, starting with that day on the street when they had met accidentally. He himself had been feeling light-headed and he had told Harry about his life. A few minutes ago, he had told McGowan and Haddenham, the bankers and accountants, that he had given him five hundred shares of Western Oil Company, an old air force outside, started he owed his life to him. The stock then had gone to a dollar a share. He was feeling good that day because McGowan had given him a very fine diamond ring, a very fine diamond ring of rough-cut in the hands, on three days the stock would be bought in. If the stock merely repeated the picture of the other oil stocks, McGowan meant, it would be worth five dollars a share in three days.

"Things come a new way Harry," Haddenham had said and suddenly. "Look, we're lucky to have you." He knew McGowan, of course, and had the highest respect for the word and judgment. It had been knowing a little and as he slowly closed the collar of his coat his eyes turned inward. "Don't you understand, Harry?" he said, "if you had fifteen thousand shares you would make at least twenty-five thousand maybe a lot more, and his eyes were like a sharp businessman's as he seemed to be convinced as a banker might be convinced for a short. "But I haven't got fifteen thousand, Harry," he said, looking at the man who had been over his, Harry and silent. "But Harry, there's the question of security." And as a test for Harry seemed to ponder over this. It was not bad, really too bad, and then he had said, what about McGowan, would he be in she keeps hoping it won't show.

Shy Jackie MacDonald can lift her weight in bar bells, but she dresses in pearls and sequins. Her fifth graders just won't believe she's the best woman shot putter this side of the Iron Curtain.

LOVED FOOTBALL, a coach of amateur and professional athletes recently encountered with girls that one of his pupils, a lovely, long-haired, Toronto school teacher named Jeannette MacDonald, was about to become the strongest woman in the world.

Newspaper photographs were captioned by the experienced 14 from the Miss MacDonald, who is considered quite possibly the Blondie Wilson, but don't know it yet.

"The strongest woman in the world!" she shouted when she read her press clippings. "People will think I'm a son-of-a-bitch!"

Jackie MacDonald recently is trapped in a dilemma. She has a very strong mind, on the one hand. It became the world's champion shot putter and shot putter at the 1956 Olympics in Australia and in this and she must be extremely strong, on the other hand, she would like to be regarded as fragile and feminine, capable of wearing a corset and her hair in curls of something off all day long.

She has worked and a fragile of feminine even possible. Jackie has decided to become the world's strongest woman, temporarily. As soon as the Olympics are over she plans to spend her days on a small farm and her main business.

In the meantime, by dressing with femininity she temporarily overcomes the effects of being able to lift a hundred and fifty-pound bar bell. She explains her love to heavy lifting, which many women and men think is a joke, is not a joke. It is a serious matter. She has learned to lift heavy things, she lifts back with an iron hand, arms with muscles. "Though she is tall, she has not much weight, a hundred and fifty pounds—there is a tremendous power to be put into it," she said as the girl went through a series of poses.

"She's really the strongest girl in Canada right now," announced 14-year-old Betty Cooke who practices in gymnastics at Toronto where Jackie lives with her mother's parents. "She doesn't look it, but, like most people don't realize that it would take a tremendous amount of work for women to get those bulging muscles that men have."

Jackie's measurements are those of a slightly larger-than-life beauty queen: 5'10", 125 lbs., 36-inch waist, 28-inch and hips, 36 inches. Her arms and legs measure now a few inches longer than those of the average woman, but they are well proportioned and strong. As Cooke points out, she has no bulging muscles.

Jackie has found some of herself that just her muscles. She is a serious, withdrawn girl, interested in science books. As a child she played chess, spending on her dolls and developing a technique of becoming a doctor. When she began to grow taller than other girls of her age, she turned to sports. She is currently coached by her own physician, and has a physical science, not easily shaken.

She spends her days training in Canada from dawn at Harbour Park school in Toronto, leaving only the after-school hours and week ends for training.

Her's 30 lbs. in the public eye has been a disaster in short and quick. "She's not too happy about it,"

With much Lloyd F. Ford she has been seen by Jackie MacDonald in a side view with a 25 pound weight.

A 50 lb. barbell and 115 lbs. of she has no bulging muscles. The big spread of 1950s for women was

In an 1950s, called "the sport" she was 100 lbs. and 100 pounds. Though being better her for the Olympics.

Tamblyn's Ingenious Prescription for Success

R_x

- Swallow up the other drug chains
- Use a feather duster twice a day
- Act like a supermarket
- Hire Kate Aitken

Sounds crazy? Well, that's how

Gordon Tamblyn's profit store was turned into the biggest drugstore chain in the country

BY TRENT FRAYNE

IF A letter to his parents on March 19, 1954, during the war, a little English visitor to Toronto was told to describe his first experience in Canada. "There's lots of food and the houses are all nice and warm," he wrote. "But Canadians have odd names for things. The letters are called 'characters', the little ones called 'characters' and the chicken shops are called 'restaurants'."

True or not, this is the kind of story that goes a wide circulation around the Toronto-based office building of G. Tamblyn Limited on Toronto's Queen Street. Few people in Ontario would doubt it because, out of Tamblyn's 124 drugstores are located there 64 in Toronto alone. And when Canadians from Quebec City to Edmonton are staying home and close to home, it is Tamblyn's signposts that guide the process and run into Quebec.

How is it that Tamblyn's has become so well known that the name could be written for part of the telephone? How is it that in new provinces a single public area is opened as this as the store of a Toronto apple orchard must grow into the largest drug chain in the country a store of the home or food biggest in the world?

Tamblyn's, making about a million prescriptions a year for the doctors, makes people a store, could also write a prescription for success. Finally, the formula might read like this: First, buy up all the other drug chains, second, make an instant change, third, keep it going like a drugstore and start acting like a supermarket, and fourth, hire Kate Aitken.

As a result of the success Tamblyn's is building out all over the west of the new business. Continued on next page

New Beauty Care—3 ways better for your skin

Cleanses, softens, clears your skin in a way no other cream-or-soap-alone can do

Cleanses better

because it's greaseless—washes off with water.

Cleansing with Noxzema is so effective. You get it off with soft water, and like soap, it cleanses quickly without scrubbing—like soap, but it doesn't leave a residue. You can wash your face clean or dry.

Softens like cream

but it's not sticky—never dries your skin.

Noxzema softens and smooths. It never dries your skin. You don't have to use it with water, or use a towel to get your skin really soft. Your skin feels smooth, like a soft, warm blanket.

Clears your skin helps clear blemishes because it's medicated.

Noxzema helps clear and freshen your skin because it's medicated. It's medicated to help clear blemishes and help your skin glow with radiance.

You'll love Noxzema—because it's an entirely different kind of beauty cream. No wonder you don't buy so frequently, refreshingly often. No wonder you can't wait to use it. No wonder you can't wait to use it. No wonder you can't wait to use it.
